Tupelo offers strategies for development in Rockcastle County

When the city of Tupelo was leveled by a tornado in 1936, residents were faced with the challenge of rebuilding an already economically troubled town. George McLean, the owner of the local newspaper, looked past the tragedy and saw an opportunity for citizens to create a stronger community. He engaged local support and eventually founded the Community Development Foundation, which coordinated development

In the following decades, Tupelo attended to developing its human resources, local leaders, community organizations and the community itself in addition to tackling economic development. From industry to health care, workers in Tupelo were prepared to undertake whatever tasks the next stage of economic development presented. To learn more about how Rockcastle County can discover its own niche in the modern economy, attend the community meeting with Vaughn Grisham on March 29.
