

"When we were dating, he was wonderful," June told me. "He was a perfect gentleman. But the minute we got married, he changed."

June had come for counseling to try to save her marriage. (All characters are fictitious.) "How did he change after the marriage?" I asked June.

"He started drinking more," she answered. "I never noticed him drinking that much while we were dating. And he began to push and shove me when he would get angry. He would always apologize afterward and promise he wouldn't do it again, and I believed him."

Was June correct that her husband had changed so much? Or was June so in love when they were dating that she did not see the warning signals? Or is it a little bit of both?

Probably, the latter. Most people can, for a limited amount of time, disguise the problems that plague them. June's husband was on his best behavior throughout their courtship, hiding the violence and addiction that were a part of his life. When he and June married, he "let his guard down" and did not worry so much about looking good in June's eyes. Now that she was his, he concluded that he did not have to try so hard.

It is also probably true that June missed some warning signs that occurred early in the relationship. Though he tried to hide it, some violence and addiction must have come through. "How long did the two of you date?" I asked June.

"We knew each other for a year," she answered, "but really only dated for six or seven months." When I questioned June further, she finally admitted that they had really dated for only two months before they were married. "I guess that wasn't enough time, was it?" June asked.

I asked June to look back on their courtship and see if she could remember any times before they were married when he drank or was violent. "Now that you mention it," she replied, "there was the party at his sister's when he got really drunk. This happened a couple of weeks after we started dating. I decided to overlook that. He did not seem to have a problem with alcohol at any other times."

"What about the violence?" I inquired. "Can you look back and see any signs of that during your dating?"

"Once when we were going out to dinner, he got really mad," she told me. "He hit his fist against the dash of the car several times. I was afraid he was going to hit me, but he never did. Another time he threw a plate across the kitchen and broke it. I cannot even remember what he was so angry about."

"Did those incidents cause you any concern?" I asked.

"Well, I didn't like them," she answered, "but I just didn't think about them. I didn't want to say or do anything that might make him leave me." June was right: her boyfriend did change after the wedding. Also she had overlooked some definite warning signals while they were dating. Together his change and her blindness opened the door for an abusive relationship. "I guess love really is blind, isn't it?" June concluded.
