

mixed feelings. On one hand, I want to get back home and see my kids. On the other hand, this is undoubtedly the best group of kids I've ever had to travel with, and there's so much more to see out there. However, since we're running short on money and school will be starting soon, we really need to head on home.

The humidity has been rising as we get close to home and just about everyone had commented about it. Later on in the day, one of the kids comes to the front of the bus and asks where the sky went. The haze is starting to build.

As we get near to exit 62, the kids start chanting, "are we there yet... are we there yet" over and over. I thought about going right past the exit and getting off the Livingston exit, but I'm glad I didn't. Wendy's and KFC have both put up signs, welcoming us back home from our trip. The parents have also placed large signs near the school entrance.

When we pull into the parking lot, it's full of family and friends. Even our son is there, on his way home to Lexington from work. The parents have even got a cake, decorated with a school bus.

Soon, everyone had departed and gone home with their families. Tomorrow a group of them will meet at our house, to unload equipment. Then we'll all meet at the bus garage to clean the bus inside and out.

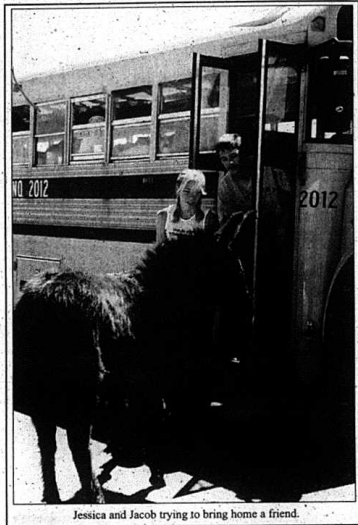

It's been just about a perfect trip. The weather couldn't have been nicer. The group could not have had any better people on it. There were no serious injuries or sickness. There was not one complaint from the kids about the long bus ride, not one. We are so privileged to have been able to make this trip and we know the educational value exceeded our goals. We have such a beautiful country to live in and we hope we shared just a little of it with all of you through this journal and with the photos.
