An encouraging word:

Hope Is A Transforming Power

By Howard Coop

As I looked out the window behind my desk, I saw a beautiful mountain scene, and I heard birds singing cheerfully in the nearby trees. It was, indeed, a beautiful morning. Everything seemed so pleasant. In the reverse of the moment, I recalled the words of a little girl named Pippa from Robert Browning's poem called Pippa Passes who declared: "All's right with the world."

Then, things changed abruptly. The door to my office opened, and a man entered. With a bedraggled look, he was sad and lonely. After slumping into a chair in front of my desk, he stared at the floor for a moment and sat silently. When he did speak, his first words were: "I had hoped..."

A short time earlier, the man's wife of many years had died, and he was feeling the burden of that loss. As I looked into his sad face, the first thing that came to my mind was a line from Robert Frost's poem, The Death of the Hired Man: With "nothing to look forward to with hope, so now and never any difference."

When one is hopeless, all is gone. The bottom drops out of life, and nothing matters any more. The man sitting in my office that beautiful morning was the epitome of hopelessness. Everything he said, and everything he did revealed it.

But hope, when properly grounded, is more than wishful thinking; it is a transforming power that can energize and enliven anyone. Even in the most difficult situations in one's life, hope can keep one going.

As that lonely man and I talked that beautiful morning, I remembered some significant words, many centuries old, that attest to the tremendous power of hope. When things were not going well for him, "Against all hope" another man "in hope believed and so he became..." Because he hoped, life, for him, was changed dramatically.

For anyone, hope is a transforming power that can change life.
